Background

In today's fast moving world, information management is key to strategizing and managing your business, and expenditure of effort on non-essential functions should be minimised as far as possible.

Increasingly we find not only SHEQ practitioners, but supervisory level employees spending more time doing non-essential jobs and activities than they spend doing their core functions, detracting from their effectiveness as the champions of the SHEQ system and so depressing the organisations performance of their safety, health, environmental and quality systems and overall effectiveness.

Introducing the GSRC e-SHE system

Every day, across industry and the mines, countless types of inspections are completed, all of which need to be captured by somebody and then later analysed for trends and statistics.

Wouldn't it be great to conduct the entire range of inspections, upload them immediately and have a report automatically generated highlighting your organisational or departmental deviances, all at the click of a button? Everyday untold numbers of risk assessments are conducted on paper which then need capturing at a later date, which again need human time spent tracking and drawing trends and statistics.

Why not have Risk Assessments automatically update the database in real-time, illustrating the actual controls implemented in that area or department at the time of the task being completed?

Internal audits are done throughout the year and auditors must spend the same amount of time as they took on the physical audit to then compile their reports and statistics.

Wouldn't it add value to be able to conduct your internal audits electronically and have them uploaded at the click of a button with the ability to generate reports immediately?

There are numerous other instances of personnel spending their time conducting non-core functions, detracting from their overall performance and hampering their effectiveness, throughout industry and the mines across the world.

If this reminds you of your own organisation, then its time you talked to GSRC Management about our industry leading e-SHE system that allows you to save your company time and money, improve your company's effectiveness and improve the performance of your overall SHEQ system.

This system aims to free-up your SHEQ practitioners, supervisors and other affected parties from non-essential activities and allows them to focus on their core functions, improving efficiencies in the business, adding value to your bottom line performance and improving your organisations report and control time frames, all at a cost that falls well below your expectations.
